

If I was the president of the United States of America I would make recycling mandatory for everyone. I would give every home a recycling can that they put all their recyclables in and leave outside once a week for a big dumpster to get. Then the dumpster takes the trash to the recycling plant to be recycled. This would be a cheap and easy way to get everyone to recycle. Also it will be very efficient in getting a high percentage of the nation's recyclables recycled.

Another thing I would do if I were president is build many more recycling plants around the nation. I would try to put at least one plant in every county, maybe some counties will share plants. It depends on the size and population of each county. This would make it so that the dump trucks won't have to go as far to drop off the trash and so there is enough plants to recycle all of the trash.

All of the changes will be very expensive for the nation but it will greatly help the environment and it will reduce other costs. The environment will benefit a lot from making recycling mandatory. Also less trash will have to be taken to landfills and less landfills will have to be built. That's one example of costs being lowered because it costs money to build landfills and that money won't be needed any more. If all these changes occurred around the United States the nation would definitely benefit greatly. Many of these benefits wouldn't occur right away, but they'd be very effective and evident in the long run.

All of these changes would make the United States of America a much better place to live in. Our air and environment would be much cleaner due to less landfills and trash burning. Landfills are basically a mound of trash that really pollutes our air. If my changes took place, they wouldn't be necessary and we would all live in a better place.
